Lost a Day out with friends

This happened when I was 19, I'm 27 now. At the time I was still dating my high school boyfriend, he lived two towns away from me but we spent every weekend together. My best friend, Jill had also been friends with Alan (boyfriend) since middle school, so we were all very close. So Jill and I worked together at a medical supply factory, and we would occasionally come up with some great adventures to go on on the weekends. This week was no exception.

We had made plans to all drive out to Alan's after work on Friday, spend the night, then get up and go on our adventure Saturday morning.

Friday rolls around, Jill and I get off work and swing by our apartment to pick up our guitars and backpacks for our sleepover. We drive out to Alan's, start cooking up our frozen pizzas, and bust out the guitars and Xbox.

We play and talk and eat till around midnight, then decide we should get some sleep for our trip in the a.m. Alan had a futon in the living room that Jill slept on, while Alan and I went to his room on the other side of the living room. We all said goodnight to each other and went to sleep.

Saturday morning, I wake up and walk through the living room to go to the bathroom. Jill grumbles a g'mernin at me as I walk past. I tell her to get up, it's almost 7 and we gotta get on the road. We all get ourselves ready and into Alan's '92 baby blue Ford Taurus. Then it got weird.

We backed down the driveway, Alan driving, me up front, Jill sitting behind Alan. Then the next thing any of us remember, Jill and I are backing down Alan's driveway, in her car, having just returned from our day and it was 6:30pm. We were both smiling and Jill looked at me and her face fell.

She looked me dead in the eyes and asked me what had just happened. It took a second for my feeling of euphoria to clear, like I'd just had a REALLY good dream, but then I realized that I couldn't remember where we'd all went after backing down Alan's driveway that morning. So, being reasonable level headed people, we pulled back into Alan's and went to see what he had to say.

We knocked and when Alan opened the door we knew he'd had the same reaction as us. He was pale and wide eyed and just mumbled out a "doyouguysrememberwhatthefuckhappened?". And none of us did, we sat down and went over the details of the night and early morning over and over. We kept crying and having to stop to console each other, but we could not come up with any details past backing down the driveway. Alan remembered going into his house, but not driving up to it or parking his car. Jill and I don't remember getting into her car or seeing Alan go inside.

Oh, and none of us can recall what the plan for our Saturday adventure was. We know we had a destination and activities planned, but not one of us can recall a single detail about what the plan was other than: 1. Drive to Alan's 2. Spend the night 3. Get up early Saturday the time.

Through the years we've brought it up to each other now and then, just a passing thought of how freaking bizarre it is that we still can't recall any other details of that day. Part of what bothers me about it, is how it's become such a nonchalant topic to bring up now, even though it was very traumatizing at the time. We just so willingly fell into calling it our abduction, even though none of us have a clue...

Edit: TL/DR: went on a weekend adventure, no one remembers what we did.

This is crazy, and I have to wonder what you and Jill were laughing at if you'd just been abducted by aliens or drugged by government officials. It's really unsettling.

I had a similar experience with a friend in high school, we didn't lose as much time as you, about an hour. I remember leaving gym class with my friend Denise and next thing I know it's an hour later and I'm sitting in English. I did not have a clue how I got there, or what the teacher was discussing and there was no gap in my memories - literally felt like one second ago we were leaving the gym and then I blinked and I was sitting there. I looked over at Denise and she was looking at me freaked the fuck out and pale as shit which is probably what I looked like too lol.

Did you have to go outside from gym or could have possibly been in some sort of accident that killed you both and you jumped? I kinda think that might have happened to us. Alan's driveway backed onto the main road in town, so I thought we could have been backing up laughing our heads off, crashed and died then jumped so quick we were still laughing? Idk, somehow an abduction seems more reasonable lol

Ugh, it was such a creepy feeling. I remember seeing her face fall and immediately getting the impression that we had just been full force laughing our faces off about someone being dead. Phew, gives me chills still.

This was definitely unsettling.

Did any of you ever try hypnosis to get it back?

Is it possible that you all were drugged? I mean, anything at all could have happened. You may have gone out that Saturday morning to check out some spooky place you heard about (anything in your area like an abandoned building or government center that is out of use? Narrow down the possibilities of where you could reasonable gone.), and when you got there it turned out to be highly secret operation the government was doing? You could have been abducted by the government, or another secret organization. You could have walked into a ritual and the participants had to make sure you never remembered it. SO Many possibilities here. I would suggest narrowing down where you could have possibly gone and also research any news stories that were written one week prior and a week following your Saturday misadventure. You have to look deep, and don't be hesitant to look at any of the more unreliable news sources that may have reported something in your area. You have to find out what happened!

It's definitely on our list of possibilities, we could have been abducted by a group then drugged. It was just strange how none of us felt any different once we stopped smiling, and that only lasted a couple of seconds. No hangovers or headaches or any other weird thing, it was like we were ludicrously happy having spent the day doing nothing then horrified that we couldn't remember. It was in mid June that this happened, I'm from the Midwest so we're pretty sure we weren't swimming. We ran through possibilities from we walked around the mall all day to going hiking to the old sanitorium grounds Jill used to live by in high school. We just have no leads other than everything. The only remarkable thing in the news anywhere close to that time were crop circles showing up out on some corn farmer's property the summer before. By the end of summer though, folks were pretty sure they were fake.

I second this. Had it been more recent I'd have suggested going through your text conversations, surely you'd have said SOMETHING about where you were going, either to Jill or Alan or even a different friend or a parent to let them know where you'd be. I also wondered about being dragged, but it doesn't sound like you went anywhere for breakfast or coffee because you had to get going... Can you remember what you had for breakfast before you left? Can you think of what you and your friends might plan that would require getting up so early? Just things to think about, I'm sure you've already gone over them but if you reply we can try to help you get a better answer than a casual alien abduction.

Hypnotised in advanced: instructed to rob a bank, drop off the money at X and then forget everything you did...

Perhaps! Just have to figure out who knew the three of us well enough to orchestrate it without us finding out they were rich after. Unless...they hypnotized us to forget we'd ever known them then fled with their dirty money o.o

Maybe you guys learned or experienced something on that adventure that you weren't supposed to. Something that breaks the rules of our reality. Perhaps your collective memory loss was a way to correct a mistake of sorts.

Just seems awful fishy that both the memories of the entire adventure and the memories of the predetermined plans for the adventure were suppressed. Seems too specific to be a natural phenomenon or fluke.

happens people can at least recall what they had been previously intending on doing. What kind of heavy drugs would they use to make you forget plans you'd made days before hand? Ahh, I'm creeping myself out it must've been an abduction but it was no big deal, we were all fine. No weird side effects or physical evidence of anything. Shit like this must happen all the time.

Whaaat? Alien abduction is no big deal? I'd rather have these things be related to time/parallel reality glitches than abduction.

Not like "just another day getting abducted" sort of no big deal, just that we were all in one piece, no one had any extra pieces, and none of us were mentally traumatized outside of having lost roughly 11 hours of our lives. But after some stories I've read I consider ourselves lucky.

Your story is really significant considering a lot of glitches like this seem to be very private memory issues, that could conceivably put down to a micro brain aneurism or something. But actually I'm surprised someone else hasn't pointed out there could have been a carbon monoxide issue in the house. I can't find it right now but there is a famous reddit post by a guy who kept finding post it notes with messages all over his house and someone on reddit actually solved it as C monoxide and saved his life. Turned out he'd been writing them himself. But odd that your memories all started and ended at the same point. Gas in the car maybe...?
